India Calls for Climate Fairness as CBAM Dominates COP30 Talks

At the 30th United Nations Climate Change Conference (COP30) in Belém, Brazil, India emerged as a leading advocate for climate justice, urging the global community to align climate action with principles of equity. A central theme of the summit has been the growing link between climate policy and global trade — particularly through the proposed Carbon Border Adjustment Mechanism (CBAM), a tax on imports based on their carbon footprint.

While developing nations are committed to climate mitigation, they cannot be unfairly burdened. The country stressed that adaptation needs and developmental priorities must be recognized, especially for those with limited financial and technological resources. India strongly reiterated that developed nations, historically responsible for the majority of emissions, must fulfill their commitments to provide climate finance and technology transfer.

The European Union's CBAM emerged as one of the most contentious issues at COP30. India argued that such unilateral trade measures risk becoming disguised barriers that undermine the competitiveness of developing economies. By imposing additional levies on carbon-intensive exports like steel, cement and aluminum, CBAM could disadvantage nations still transitioning to cleaner production systems.

India called for a balanced approach — one that supports global climate goals without penalising economies still striving for industrial growth and poverty eradication. The country emphasized that climate action should not conflict with the right to development and fair access to global markets.

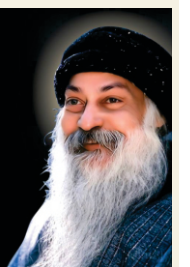

Though the final outcome from COP30 did acknowledge concerns raised by developing nations, major decisions on trade-linked climate measures remain unresolved. The debate has signaled the beginning of a new era where climate diplomacy and trade negotiations move hand-in-hand.

For India, the path ahead involves accelerating industrial decarbonization while ensuring that global rules are just, inclusive and supportive of long-term sustainable development.
